Though vital to containing the spread of Covid-19, sheltering-in-place has disrupted our sense of time. Hours and days spent indoors blur as familiar work and social routines are temporarily suspended. Regarding what feels like an excess of time, the phrase “be careful what you wish for” is aptly, uncomfortably, appropriate.

Through drawing, painting, sculpture, and research and archival practices, A.R. Keiner strives to “trap time.” She does this by revisiting, fragmenting, and recontextualizing older projects and objects. In their original form, prior work represents what Keiner calls “the then.” Once repurposed as the physical ground for new work, earlier projects fragment and reform as creative curiosities or questions, “the now.” The temporal and physical span between what was and what is shrinks, perhaps activating in viewers, as it does for the artist, an existential reckoning with past, present, and future beginnings and endings, then and now.

A self-identified “maximalist,” Keiner’s thesis incorporates multiple discrete projects that reflect time as a somatic experience. Acoustic Energy Distribution of Chorus Howls, an imposing three-panel mixed media installation, conveys movement through a forest in winter. Working with a specific gestural pattern that references the artist’s dance background, Keiner conveys the experience of moving through a landscape, not the landscape itself. In The Entropy Cliché, Keiner nods to her work as a bereavement educator and advocate, and the unexpected death of her son in 2012. Drawings excised from their original context serve as the ground for oil paintings, and from the cracks that form on the vibrant unprimed surface of each, a metaphor for the scars that time and grief leave on our bodies and minds emerges. The impact of Keiner’s work measures beyond her exploration of time and embodiment. It also resists the comfortable notion that the fruits of creative labor are ever “finished.” It activates questions about who, if not the artist, determines when an object or a body of work is complete, ready for consumption by peers, academic advisors, viewing audiences, and the market-driven art world at large. Keiner poses a timely critique of who enjoys the monetary and material privilege associated with art making, access to higher education, and the role institutional forces play in artists’ success.
Instructions: building the gallery

- dotted lines - cut (extend cuts to ends of paper)
- solid black line - fold (extend folds to ends of paper)
- semi circles - fold into each other and connect
- colors - fold into each other

(back side of gallery)

San Francisco State University
School of Art
2020 MFA Thesis Exhibition
gallery.sfsu.edu

SFSU School of Art
VIRTUAL 2020 MFA Thesis Exhibition
18 June to 18 July, 2020
https://tinyurl.com/y734jope

Essay by Roula Seikaly.
Design by Carolina Cervantes, based on A.R. Kramer’s Paper Gallery